TITANIC—THE LAST SCENE

"A NIGHTMARE OF SIGHT AND SOUND . . . HELP WAS IMPOSSIBLE" Just before launching the last two lifeboats, I had made my final hurried visit to the stairway.

and, for a few minutes, I completely lost grip of myself—and no wonder, for I was perspiring freely, whilst the temperature of the water was 25 degrees, or four degrees below freezing.

A HEAD of the look-out cage on the foremast was visible just above the water—in normal times it would be a hundred feet above.

I struck out blindly for this, but only for a short while, till I got hold of myself again and realised the futility of seeking safety on anything connected with the ship.

The last life-boat having got away, the remaining No. 2 boat, which was actually a small sea boat used for emergency purposes—in fact, often termed "the emergency boat"—hanging in the davits.

Much earlier on the engine-room telegraphs had been "Rung off"—the last ring made on board ships at sea, and which conveyed to the engine-room staff the information that their services below can be of no further use.

At the same time, it releases engineers and stokers from duty, leaving them free to make the best of their way to the boats. Of course, in theory, each has his appointed place in a given boat.

Since the Titanic disaster, each undoubtedly has, but before that tragedy brought home to the world the utter fallacy of the "unsinkable ship" I'm afraid that many "appointed places" were just so much theory.

There was little opportunity to say more than a word or two to the engineers. Up to that time they had known little of what was going on, and it was surely a bleak and hopeless spectacle that met their eyes.

Collapsible Boats. There now only remained two folded boats of the Eicheheart type, with collapsible canvas sides, one on the deck by the davits of No. 1 emergency and one on top of the officers' quarters, both firmly lashed down.

Dragged Back. Although I struggled and kicked for all I was worth, it was impossible to get away, for as fast as I pushed myself off I was irresistibly dragged back, every instant expecting the wire to go, and to find myself shot down into the bowels of the ship.

Over the Bridge. Just then the ship took a slight but definite plunge—probably a bulkhead west—and the sea came rolling up in a wave, over the steel-fronted bridge, along the deck below us, washing the people back in a dreadful huddled mass.

Hanging On. In the circumstances, I made no effort to get on top of the upturned boat, but, for some reason, was content to remain floating alongside, just hanging on to a small piece of rope.

Organised help, or even individual help, was quite impossible. All one could do was just wait on events and try and forget the icy cold grip of the water.

A Liberal Creed

MR RAMSAY MUIR has been trying to discover reasons why Liberals should not follow Sir John Simon in support of the National Government.

The effort has made it necessary for him to discover differences between Liberal policy and the Government's policy, and therefore to make a kind of Liberal creed of immediate application to the problems of the day.

He charges the Government with being in earnest in their support of the League—a matter of intention which hardly is brought to the test of the Government's actions.

On Free Trade, he sets out the Liberal position to be "the progressive reduction and ultimate removal of trade barriers, and going in the opposite direction."

Under the head of Liberty Mr. Ramsay Muir is mostly concerned with what he calls the pseudo-socialism of the Government's marketing boards and their "over" the livelihood of free men.

Imports and Exports. THE dry figures of the Board of Trade show that British imports and exports in 1935 were very agreeable compared with the year before.

Our foreign trade is growing, and internal prices have not risen. The improvement is spread over the great industries. Even coal, the hardest hit of them all, increased foreign sales by over £1,000,000.

THE vital WIRELESS MESSAGE. To the Editor of the Telegraph and Post. Sir—Referring to your article by Commander Lightoller on the sinking of the Titanic, I would like to add a word of explanation for your readers regarding what he described as "The vital wireless message."

THE Salmon and the Fly. A CHARGE of illegally fishing a salmon with a fly hook attracted attention to a weighted line was found not to be in Perth Sheriff Court yesterday.
